ART TALKS BACK

2020 AND 2021 WINNING SELECTIONS

THE MUSKEGON MUSEUM OF ART
When I sit to write three women come to play with my explosion of ink on paper or a pale grey dot unsure if it's a comma or a knot.
The paper becomes a random pattern of lines crossed out or bracketed by their hips.
These women circle around a word or phrase with a curvy question - which word, what break, who?
They love to smart mouth my haughty words and make a liar of me, a knee jutting or elbow poking at some shine posing for a camera or my lazy beg for a compliment.
Sometimes they are so bold I want to cover them with claptrap robes or shush them with a finger smudge of ink.
Often they riff with whispers and snorts a heart guffaw at my cliches and rip the poem in half with their scorn.
Once they kicked the pen right out of my hand, kicked my can to the curb with their sway.
These three stand in chorus line coaxing me to come closer.

Are these my muses?
At times, when I believe they are.

"Loretta, Gladys, and Grace" was inspired by: "THREE MUSES"
by Joseph E. Grey
courtesy of the Muskegon Museum of Art's permanent collection At this moment, years ago, days ahead there is always

time to paint the house red shop with girlfriends walk the dog get your nails done.

Today, back then, years from now there is always
time to bake a lemon pudding cake for a grieving family or a daughter’s birthday slather peanut butter and jelly on soft white bread for the kids with missing mothers, empty cupboards

In this instant, days gone by, and years ahead
there is always
time to let our laughter float & frolic above shower us like confetti sparkling in a brilliant sun embrace strangers, share smiles, hand out compliments like peppermints and dance together 'til the color of our skin, dollars in our pockets and who we love does not separate our arms & hips & legs as we sway to the beat together clap our hands, shake our heads, chirp and sing
the poetry of nightingales

There is always time for this.
"Body Image" was inspired by:
"THREE MUSES"
by Joseph E. Grey
courtesy of the Muskegon Museum of Art's permanent collection

ART TALKS BACK 2020 3RD PLACE AWARD

"Body Image"

BY VICTORIA EVERITT

I'm only just a mirror, you see.
Well, actually, I'm three in one, a tri-fold mirror,
The kind they used to have in ladies' clothing shops?
Women went in nooks called dressing rooms -- Although undressing happened, too -- And stripped down to their underthings, "Unmentionables" they were,
And sometimes even those were shed To don the frocks and smocks and skirts That might fit well enough to purchase but usually did not Such a lot of bodies stood before me in those days, Bodies of every size and shape and age,
And such a lot of eyes, ten thousand eyes!
The eyes, you see, they were the same,
So focused, narrowed, judge and jury;
They didn't like what they saw and sometimes cried, Even if the garment fit, indubitably then.
When I was new, I took it much to heart.
Was I responsible? They're looking right at me!
But as I aged, un tarnished still,
I finally understood That I did just what I was made to do,
A magic trick with silver and with light.
I'm only a mirror, you see, a trinity of mirrors,
And to this day I've never known Just why they shed those tears.
Hey You!

You look at me - the one girl on that bus. You're askin' yerself, Who's that one girl with a bus full of fellers? That's what you're thinkin', right?

Who's that one girl? And chances are you're not thinkin' virgin. You're not thinkin' wholesome/ What comes into your dirt old mind?

That's me in that picture! Keep your dirty old thoughts to yerself, Because that's me - Constance Enola Morgan - And I am somebody!

So tell me, when you look at me, when you look at me, nineteen years old Five foot four, and a hundred thirty five pounds, What do you really think?
You're sure not thinkin' ball player, right hander, second baseman.
No, you're thinkin' career Battin' average .368, are ya?

The better 'n Ty Cobb, for your information. But you're not thinkin' That girl can play catcher good as anyone. She's so quick She can pull a ball out of thin air

And throw like the wind. Nope.
You won't be thinkin' that. See me lookin' out The winder in a bus full of fellas?

Mister, in that there picture, you should see how I am happy.
I am playin' in the Negro American League because I am good!
Better n' a man, if you want to know.

With all those men they put me in third line to bat
'Cause I am fast, and I hit like a man.
They put me there to win the game.

Ten grand a season, mister,
I am little Connie Morgan from Philly,
And I am playin' ball.
Well Ladies, What are we doing later? It’s been a long session. These lights are hot tonight. But the fan is hitting me right on my left boob. I almost didn’t come today, How about you, Sue? How’s your little one? How’s her croup? Have you been getting any rest at all? Norma, are you MAD at me? Why so stand-offish? Are you coming out with us tonight? How’s your man, Stan? Still giving you the blues, with his slimey moves? Men! Who needs them? Can’t trust them. Don’t understand them. Can’t seem to live without them. My knees are locked. My thigh keeps cramping, Bananas, I hear, are really good for that! Wish I hadn’t had that pizza for lunch. I feel so bloated. Do you think my stomach is looking poochey? I used to be so flat bellied-slim!

Those were the days & nights, ah, the nights... When I was young. & my legs! Always had dancer’s legs. Strong & lean. Made for leaping & twirling.
Anyway, here we are, standing under these hot lights. It looks like we don’t even care. All those students. Staring at us with their pouty lips & piercings. Trying to look like they might be the next Picasso. We don’t even get to see the masterpieces. How do they see us? What do they think we think? Do they see that our legs are cramping, our stomachs growling & our lower backs aching? Stripped down to naked truth. Standing before them with sweaty, hairy pits. Exposed to the Universe. Feet oversized & swollen. Butt full of ripples (used to be curvy). Now it's just flab. Norma! What’s WRONG with you anyway? You haven’t even moved! Are you frozen into your chubby calves? Are you locked down in loneliness? Did your man leave you? Did you discover that he likes young men afterall? Did he find a svelte young dancer to take your place? Now that you’ve gone all slime green, puke pink & yellow angles? Bowed-down from the standing, bowed-over from the glaring? All of your privacies having been seen. All of your dream-lands having been had. You’re just like the rest of us now, bulges & back fat. Elbows ebbing with silly putty & bat wings flowing from shoulders that slope unevenly. Throat full of ripples & ravaged edges. Once you had a sculpted chin, haughty and audacious. We only have another 30 minutes. Then we can move. Move, blessedly move! Stretch the knotted shoulders, gone green now, with the gazes of young artists. So, tell me- Does this hot light Make me Look Fat tonight?
"Prosperity to Generosity: A Sestina of a Lumber Baron" was inspired by: "PORTRAIT OF CHARLES HACKLEY" by Edwin A. Turner courtesy of the Muskegon Museum of Art's permanent collection

ART TALKS BACK 2020 HONORABLE MENTION

"Prosperity to Generosity: A Sestina of a Lumber Baron"

BY CAROL VOIGTS

There they stood - tall, green and wild
No one yet thinking how to be prospering White pine - even oak and ash - giants standing ready to waste Sven and Johan and Stanley were now to cross paths
A hoard, a mass descendant into this place and time Sawing, chopping, creaking, crashing became so natural

Settlers rushed in and changed what was natural And camps with flapjacks and whiskey - wooly and wild
The long winters and log jammed rivers waited their time
Some men - a few - were financed, were borrowing, were prospering Horses pulled, tugged and dragged their logs down paths
At river's mouth each sawmill knew no waste

Entrepreneurs, millionaires, money to make, no time to waste While never-ending logs seemed now so natural The mill owners following their destiny, their paths
A forest, cut and sawn, has lost its wild Towns are built from this pine, growing and prospering Could there ever be a better time?

Schemes, dreams, maybe greed came in time Take it all, leave nothing, do not waste What’s a tree for but to keep us prospering?
Build the barns, the mansions, the stables, it’s natural We’ve done this with our own hands, out of the wild Hansey, Luke and Ole labor and dream too in those paths

Who among us would not want such a path?
But those schemes, dreams and wondrous plans run out in time Bankruptcies, ruin, finances gone wild
The mansions, lost riches, the debt, the waste Recovery, even again deserted, and shame so natural Though Peder, Karl, and Jerome remain, these steadily, slowly prospering

T’was one whose city selflessly he helped in prospering While others who made it had squandered their paths
This man, revered, amiable, eager, achievements so natural, now gone in time
And even as he gained his wealth, Hackley cherished learning and common good
The barn that once held the horses still remains nearby guarding his legacy of education
His mansion, his library, his museum, his schools, his hospital - the ripples are still going out

Most fell away into neglected paths of history For some, what had begun as wild thus returned to the natural Yet for one, even while prospering, no paths he wasted for our future I sat in Battery Park wiping sleep from my eyes when the Minotaur, horns sharp as stilettos, breath scented with blood, settled beside me, and I was afraid. He opened his large hand, revealed a gun, said I don’t want to die alone. I looked into his eyes, saw a cursed mother, father, a sacrifice to corrupt gods, a wounded creature, half one thing, half another, like most, like me. Do you know poetry?
When he shook his massive head, I recited words committed to memory, my companions in darkness, that lifted us off the bench, above the labyrinth to see earth tip into a new day, unspooling its bright thread to reveal our means of escape.
I didn’t know, he said,
and stared into the gilded harbor, its ever-changing waters.
He put away the gun, followed me into the waking city, past Wall Street’s bull—trapped in its own myth—stopped before a book store on Broadway, peered in while I faded into morning’s rush.
Sometimes, I catch a glimpse of him in the park, bent forward in concentration, a book, edged with light, in his hands.
When horses flew and Titans walked And vows were oft forsworn, Some moment when the gods were crazed Then surely I was born.
With monstrous head and bullish horns
And tail like tattered strings,
I was Poseidon’s punishment
On all two-legged things.
Ferocious outlaw of the Earth,
Of ancient crooked will,
Imprisoned, hated, feared was I-- Yet one soul loved me still!
My frame trapped in the labyrinth,
My mind was always freed:
My mother, daughter of the Sun,
Had taught me how to read.
Heavy head, bowed but not yet broken I stumble through the words, stagger through sentences searching for meaning desperate to find a way out of this labyrinth full of too many abrupt dead ends They would be better off without me or sudden turns from light to dark I'll never get better months where I seem to go backward when I should be going forward.
Reading one word after another I push forward, ignoring false turns in my brain that lead to a complete stop
—

I'm a burden
They wish I'd disappear forever —seeking commas, semi-colons another chapter, the next book in the series clutching tight to words laid out by heroes who wandered this maze of depression and lived to tell the tale.
I consume their stories pages scattered one after the other like bread crumbs to guide me to assure me I am not alone tell me I can find a way out convince me
I am not a monster.
Perhaps, dinner—piles of strawberry blond hair tied back in a braid, body draped with the white sheer of tribute—places the book (a mother’s urging, a guilty present) along a pebbled path. Perhaps, pages foretell fantastical futures far (of Avignon, Greystoke) and near: a boy wishing for wings, air scented by sand; a father, his ginger whiskers a hedge of thorns, joins eider, beeswax, bits of branches.

Or perhaps, parchment prompts longings: a summer field of the day’s eye, drooping heads of love-lives-bleeding; wreaths of bittersweet in autumn; the blush of Lenten rose in melting snow.

Or, maybe this gilded gift, a primer of love, scarlet madness, revenge, offers rules, a language he knows: a before b; be before see; cause, effect; exposition, resolution. He leans into yew, scarlet brambles, climbing blaze. Bronze words draw breath, as black hieroglyphs on yellow hold still, then slip with a shhh like walls in a house of cards.

A ruby thread in the footer is a lifeline linking page to page as the Mintoaur moves out of shadow into story, out of story into shadow—his, ours—from Other to other, a shimmering pink light, the world aglow and pulsing with blood.

"Red, He Read" was inspired by:
"MINOTAUR READING" by Beth Carter
courtesy of the Muskegon Museum of Art’s permanent collection Today, on the sidewalk
I found a tooth, a real human molar,
Set as a gemstone in a homemade ring made of wire.
It was one of those weird, compassless moments Of my day and now you Are reading about it in the pages of this little book Which you picked up seeking directions, Hope, or maybe just diversion
From the dark corners of this maze that is your mind.
You feel trapped, like Coronus, snapped,
When he castrated Uranus and threw his bloody balls Away, creating Space and Time And the permanent possibility of panic at what might never be,
Or the misery of the mundane March inside your own horned-head.

"2020" for Jillian

BY MARIA ROOKS
I get it. I have those moments of morass too. This year, my daughter gave the eulogy At her best friend’s funeral--killed at 21 in a biking accident. How do you navigate the sadness? The Loss? The feeling that you want to crawl out of your own skin? In this life. But those are questions, not answers. Here is what’s true: Eternity, a step out of this labyrinth, Is everything all at once, There are no gods, only God. Grace and mercy walk beside us, And promises hold our hands. But for Now, Here, In the plotless pilgrimage, sometimes We only get a tooth in a ring Made of wire.
He moves swiftly down the narrow corridors, His clublike feet jammed into clumsy boots, his little eyes rimmed with red. His stubby horns stab at the paintings hanging on the time-stained walls.
He knows there are terrified people sheltering behind the doors.
He can smell them, sweat mixing with expensive fragrance.
He feeds on the fear. He was called forward in an explosion of sparks and hatred and fear. He raises his bovine muzzle and bellows, a raw and raspy noise.
Suddenly he pulls up, cocks his head when something on the floor Catches his eye. A book. Tossed down in a celebration of chaos by some other destroyer Or dropped in desperation by someone fleeing the terror.
He picks it up and studies it, opens it, scans its pages.
He quiets. His breathing calms, his nostrils relax, his ears flick forward.
He is rapt in his reading, eyes locked on words.
Will the alchemy of absorbing thoughts and stories change him, show him a new pathway in the pages?
Or will he shrewdly turn ideas into weapons, tools to intensify the hatred? He is Schrodinger’s cat in this moment, both saved and unsaved, redeemed and persecutor. What effect will this catalyst create?
Those of us watching from a distance cannot predict.
We can only wait.
And see.
Special thanks to our Art Talk Back Committee and judges: Jerry Lang, Paula Doctor, and Al Burton